> Although the many extant Sanskrit versions of the story of King Śibi and the dove have been thoroughly studied, one version, from the Vahnipurāṇa, has so far escaped the attention of scholars. This paper presents a new, critical edition of the Sanskrit text, based on all available material — an existing edition, quotations, and a recently discovered Nepalese fragment — followed by a translation. This edition is open source; it includes diplomatic transcriptions of all witnesses, software used to collate the textual variants, the text alignments, and the stemmata used to examine certain verses. Connections to Buddhist and Jain versions of the story are discussed. The long afterlife of the text presents an opportunity to study how it has been reused and recast over the course of many centuries, quoted in dharmanibandhas and harvested for material for other stories.

Introduction

The story of King Śibi and the dove — or, more generically, syenakapotīya,<sup>1</sup> the hawk and the dove — is one of the most widespread fables in Indian literature. In Sanskrit, a number of versions have survived intact, both in prose and in verse, along with some fragments of texts that were translated into Chinese.<sup>2</sup> Different versions have a slightly different cast of characters or place the emphasis on different values — not only is the story found in the Mahābhārata, but also in Jain and Buddhist story collections and in the Tamil Puranānūru anthology of poems; there are even ancient Greek parallels and later Islamic reframings.<sup>3</sup> But the basic narrative elements remain more or less intact: a dove, fleeing a hawk, goes to a king for shelter. The hawk demands its prey, and the king offers up his own flesh instead.

Although much has been written about this story, scholars have so far missed the version of it that is told in the Vahnipurāņa. Until recently, this version was only available as snippets quoted in other texts, the longest extract being an abbreviation of the whole story found in Rādhākāntadeva's Śabda-kalpadruma, a 19th-century Sanskrit lexicon, under the entry for 'śiviḥ' and attributed to the Vahnipurāṇa.<sup>4</sup> For a long time, the Vahnipurāṇa had been confused with the Agnipurāṇa — in which the syenakapotīya story does not appear — until R. C. Hazra determined it to be a different, older text, which he thought had reached something approximating its current form by the 5th century.<sup>5</sup> Finally, in 2012, the Vahnipurāṇa was edited and published by Anasuya Bhowmik; the story of King Śibi, the siber upākhyāna, is the sixty-fifth chapter in the edition.<sup>6</sup>

Bhowmik used four Devanāgarī manuscripts to edit the text, the oldest one dated to 1589 CE.<sup>7</sup> Unfortunately, they do not seem to have been very reliable; in many places, the text is incomprehensible. However, many of those verses can be emended based on quotations and parallels in other texts. In addition, a recently discovered fragment of a Nepalese manuscript has also aided in the reconstruction of part of the text. This manuscript, as well as most of the quotations of the text, are older than the Devanāgarī manuscripts used in Bhowmik's edition. Moreover, the Vahnipurāna itself quotes from other texts that go back as far as the second century CE, and a close examination of those sources — as well as Tibetan and Chinese translations thereof — has greatly aided in clarifying the text. In this new edition, the aim has been to present the text as a link between its sources and its testimonia, showing how it transformed and reused its sources, and then, in turn, was itself transformed and re-quoted by medieval writers. We will begin by discussing the manuscript fragment, and then move on to the textual parallels that are either earlier than or roughly contemporaneous with the Vahnipurāna: the Vasudevahindi, the Mahābhārata, and the Śatapañcāśatka. Finally, we will look at the later medieval texts that quote the Vahnipurāna: the lexicons, law digests, and story collections.

BnF Sanscrit 1442.2, the Nepalese fragment

This single talipot leaf comes from the Cordier collection of the Bibliothèque nationale de France. It is part of a number of fragments found together with Sanscrit 1347, which contains an assortment of excerpts from the Brhannāradīyapurāņa in Bengali script.

&lt;sup>6</sup> This chapter title is given in the edition as well as in the Śabdakalpadruma. Hazra counted this as the 61st chapter, based on a manuscript from the Asiatic Society of Bengal.

Palmyr Cordier (1871–1914) was a French doctor who served in the colonial medical corps and who studied Indian medicine. He spent over two years stationed in Chandernagor, from 1898 to 1900, where he collected a large number of manuscripts on both medical and non-medical topics. In addition, he was able to photograph a number of Nepalese manuscripts that had been obtained by Sylvain Lévi and Haraprasāda Śāstrī;<sup>8</sup> it seems likely that this fragment was given to Cordier by one of them. Cordier died at the beginning of the First World War, and his collection was rediscovered by Jean Filliozat in 1932, at an antiquarian bookseller's in Paris, and acquired by the Bibliothèque nationale shortly thereafter.<sup>9</sup> This fragment was later given its own shelfmark by Filliozat, as No. 2 of Sanscrit 1442, 'Fragments mutilés d'ouvrages divers, etc.'<sup>10</sup>

The folio is numbered 18, indicating that it was part of a larger collection of stories. Certainly, there are many other Sanskrit story collections, either unpublished or lost, which the fragment could have come from,<sup>11</sup> but the text is a close match with the Vahnipurāṇa. It covers verses 15 to 34 of the present story, written in an old Nepalese script, often described as Bhujimol. Although it is undated, it is visually similar to manuscripts produced in Nepal between the 12th and 15th centuries;<sup>12</sup> in fact, it bears a striking similarity to a manuscript of the Bṛhatkathāślokasaṃgraha that Lévi obtained from Nepal in 1898 — around the same time as he was sharing manuscripts with Cordier — which Félix Lacôte surmised to be from the 12th century.<sup>13</sup> However, Lévi's manuscript was not reported to be missing a folio 18. Cordier is known to have created calques of Nepalese manuscripts, <sup>14</sup> but this does not seem to be the case here; at the very least, this folio was not copied from any known manuscript of the Bṛhatkathāślokasaṃgraha, since its extant portions, which were edited and published by Lacôte, do not contain this story.

Jain parallels

But perhaps there remains the possibility of a link to the Brhatkathāślokasamgraha. A portion of Vahnipurāna text in the manuscript matches the śyenakapotīya story of the Vasudevahindi, a Jain compendium of stories composed in Prakrit, possibly dating to the  $3^{rd}$  century.<sup>15</sup> The Vasudevahindi is known to be closely related to the Brhatkathāślokasamgraha — since they are both related to the legendary Brhatkathā — and scholars have even used it to reconstruct lost parts of the Brhatkathāślokasamgraha.<sup>16</sup> It is possible that the Brhatkathāślokasamgraha also once contained a version of this story, although without further evidence, it is impossible to say more.

The syenakapotīya story in the Vasudevahiņdi, where the protagonist is King Megharatha, is very short, and it is not similar overall to the Vahnipurāņa story beyond the plot points that are common to all versions. Nevertheless, it does contain a half-verse that matches one in the Vahnipurāņa text. That verse is quoted fully in a later Jain śyenakapotīya, from Nemicandra's 12th-century Ţīkā on the Uttarādhyayanasūtra (Uttarajjhayaņa Sutta) that forms an even closer match.

Although the amount of text reused is not very large, this Sanskrit verse does not appear in any other extant version of the śyenakapotīya to date. It would seem that this verse, or at least some version of it, and its association with this story, goes back further than the 5th-century date that Hazra gives for the Vahnipurāņa as a whole.

Buddhist leanings

Of the different extant Sanskrit versions of the syenakapotīya, the Vahnipurāņa text is closest to the version found in Āraņyakaparvan 131 of the Mahābhārata. It uses the same frame story: King Śibi is about to perform a great sacrificial rite, and Indra and Agni decide to test him, in the guise of the hawk and the dove.<sup>21</sup> There are also many textual parallels — most notably, the speech of the hawk in verses 21 to 26 of the Vahnipurāņa story match Āraņyakaparvan 131.6 to 131.12, although the version of these verses in the Āraṇyakaparvan is closer to the Nepalese manuscript than to the Bhowmik edition.

However, the Vahnipurāṇa story is much longer than that of the Āraṇyakaparvan, having been elaborated mainly by the insertion of didactic subhāṣita verses and hymns of praise, usually spoken by either the hawk or the king. The result is a sort of extended debate on the morality of kindness and on the imperative to protect the weak. Some of these verses can be found in other purāṇas, but, surprisingly, six of them seem to come from the Śatapañcāśatka, a famous and widespread collection of Buddhist hymns composed by Mātrceța sometime between the 2nd and 3rd centuries.<sup>22</sup>

&lt;sup>18</sup> Ed. Vijayomangasūri 1936, 244v. Oberlies translates: 'Wie dein Leben dir lieb ist, so ist allen Lebewesen ihr [Leben lieb]. Schütze das Leben der Wesen, denen ihr Leben lieb ist, wie dein eigenes Leben.... Und deshalb ist es nicht recht, diese [vor Furcht] zitternde [Taube] zu töten' (2009, 309). Meyer translates: 'As your own life is dear to thee so it is to all living beings; do thou preserve (spare) the life of life-loving beings and thy own life (i.e. in having regard for others you secure your own welfare).... Therefore it is not right to kill the one who trembles with fear' (1909, 301). The Kahāvalī also quotes verse 3 (ed. Kalyāņakīrtivijaya 2012, 75). See Dundas 2013, 17 for further versions of this story and Jacobi 1895, xl–xli on other commentaries on the Uttarādhyayanasūtra.

C. Li

Those verses, in praise of the Buddha, are here used in praise of King Śibi,<sup>23</sup> mostly clustered near the end of the story and spoken by Indra. In Buddhist tradition, Śibi is a previous incarnation of the Buddha, and the Śatapañcāśatka alludes to this: verse 12 of the Śatapañcāśatka, appearing here as verse 75, speaks of how the Buddha even gave his own flesh to protect others. As D. R. Shackleton Bailey points out, this verse is paralleled in Aśvaghoṣa's Saundarānanda, which explicitly mentions Śibi and the hawk.<sup>24</sup> Verse 13 of the Śatapañcāśatka, which does not appear here, again praises the Buddha for sacrificing his own body, and the Chinese translation — although inaccurate — renders it as 全軀救一鴿, 'your whole body to save one dove'.<sup>25</sup>

There are also structural parallels between the Śibi story in the Vahnipurāņa and Chinese Buddhist versions of the tale, which were ostensibly translated from lost Sanskrit texts. The climactic episode, in which the king offers up his whole body to the hawk, is marked by heavenly drums and a rain of flowers; although this set piece is not exclusively Buddhist, it is very prevalent in Buddhist tales and is mirrored in one Chinese version of the Śibi story,<sup>26</sup> but not found in any other extant Sanskrit version. The end of the story, in which Indra and Agni return to heaven — in the Vahnipurāṇa, this is described as tridaśālaya, the abode of the 33 gods — is also found, apart from in a few manuscripts of the Mahābhārata, only in two Chinese versions.<sup>27</sup> So while the story in the Vahnipurāṇa starts out like the version in the Āraṇyakaparvan, it ends more like a Buddhist fable; it may have even been adapted from or inspired by a Buddhist text.

A text with a split personality

Given its Buddhist influences, the parallels from the Jain Vasudevahindi and the Uttarādhyayanaţīkā, as well as further quotations found in the Karuņāvajrāyudha — a 13th-century Jain dramatic rendering of the śyenakapotīya —, the story of King Śibi in the Vahnipurāņa is uniquely situated at the nexus of Buddhist, Jain, and brahmanical traditions. This is perhaps unsurprising, giving the agglomerative quality of the text, being a mashup of narrative and subhāṣita verses culled from various sources. Some of the subhāṣita verses seem out of place, breaking up the flow of the narration;<sup>28</sup> the text bears the hallmark of the kind of additive composition that so characterizes purāṇic stories. And by looking at parallels of these verses in other texts, we can get a better idea of how the story evolved over time, and how it was transformed and mined for content by later writers.

Despite the text having been neglected by scholars, it seems to have been very well known, appearing in the Śabdakalpadruma as the definitive telling of the story of King Śibi. But as seen in the figure above, the Śabdakalpadruma presents a significantly abbreviated version of the story; it is mainly concerned with the narrative elements, cutting out many of the subhāṣitas and sometimes omitting entire speeches.<sup>29</sup> On the other hand, the many quotations found in medieval dharmanibandhas, or law digests — the Aparārka, the Bhagavantabhāskara, the Caturvargacintāmaņi, the Dānasāgara, the Krtyakalpataru, and the Vidhānapārijāta — do the very opposite: in fact, they are mainly interested in the subhāṣita verses spoken by King Śibi, especially those that extoll abhayadāna, the gift of safety.<sup>30</sup> Similarly, the Vikramacarita also reuses the subhāsita verses, since they are the most amenable to being taken out of context and inserted into a different story altogether. Consequently, the quotations in the Śabdakalpadruma, on the one hand, and in the dharmanibandhas and the Vikramacarita, on the other, almost never overlap.

It is possible that the Śabdakalpadruma preserves a different, shorter recension of the Vahnipurāņa text; however, some of the subhāșitas excluded from that abbreviated version are found quoted in the definitions for other words. In fact, one verse, quoted in the Śabdakalpadruma definition for 'siddhiḥ', and supposedly from this story, is not found in Bhowmik's edition of the story at all.<sup>31</sup> Perhaps the subhāșitas were not so skillfully integrated into the story of King Śibi; it is as if this additive text was, in the medieval period, deconstructed again, with later writers untangling the narrative threads from the pithy maxims inserted within it, each taking from the story whatever suited their own purposes.

The ironic afterlife of King Śibi

While the dharmanibandhas quote the subhāsitas in earnest, casting King Śibi as the epitome of a just and generous ruler, later texts, perhaps inevitably, reuse the king's words ironically. For example, verse 18, in which the king urges the hawk not to hurt the dove, is recast in the Hitopadeśa, spoken by a cat who feigns non-violence so that he can get into a bird's nest to eat all the hatchlings.<sup>32</sup>

In another story collection, the Vikramacarita,<sup>33</sup> 19 verses have been taken from the Sibi story and reused, split between two episodes chronicling the exploits of the legendary King Vikrama. Some of

these verses are, perhaps, borrowed via the Caturvargacintāmani, whose author, Hemādri, the Vikramacarita quotes by name.<sup>34</sup> In story 11 of the Vikramacarita, the verses are used without irony.<sup>35</sup> This story is, interestingly, also about self-sacrifice and also involves friendship between birds and humans: a village is forced to sacrifice one person each day to a raksasa who eats humans, and the next sacrifice will be a certain brahmana's son, who, in a previous life, was the friend of a certain bird — perhaps a sly reference to the syenakapotīya. While that bird is telling his father — the king of birds — about the rāksasa, Vikrama is sitting nearby and, overhearing their conversation, decides to go and offer himself to the raksasa in place of the brahmana's son. When the raksasa arrives, he praises Vikrama in verse, using lines borrowed from the speech of Sibi in the Vahnipurāna. Vikrama, in turn, recites a series of subhāsitas to him, again borrowed from the Vahnipurāņa, convincing him to stop eating humans. These are the final verses in the story; thereafter, the raksasa commits himself to non-violence.<sup>36</sup> But in the story of King Sibi, these pithy maxims are not enough to sate the hunger of the hawk (it is unclear what the raksasa in the Vikramacarita eats thereafter). In fact, the hawk counters the king's subhasitas with solid legal reasoning, which is later quoted in the Smrti*candrikā*, a  $13^{\text{th}}$ -century legal digest, as the conclusion to a chapter on how to deal with scriptural laws that contradict one another.<sup>37</sup>

On the other hand, in story 13 of the Vikramacarita, ten verses borrowed from King Śibi are used ironically, recited by a sage to an audience in a shrine which Vikrama is visiting.<sup>38</sup> The sage extols the virtue of putting one's life on the line for the sake of others, as well as the merit accrued in providing safety for all creatures. But when a brāhmaṇa and his wife fall into the river, neither the sage nor anyone else in the crowd rushes to help them; Vikrama, on the other hand, saves the couple by pulling them out of the river. In that story, a contrast is created between merely reciting subhāṣitas and actually taking action, putting one's own life at risk. Perhaps there is some of that contrast in the Vahnipurāṇa śiber upākhyāna as well; while King Śibi is well versed in the dharmaśāstras, as he himself declares, none of his words can persuade the hawk to give up its prey. In fact, the extended debate between king and hawk serves to heighten the tension between action and speech, filled as it is with didactic verses intoned by the king, which later became standard reference material incorporated into legal digests. But eventually, the king must offer up his own flesh; his words are not enough.

from the Sarvadarśanasamgraha, which he places in the 13th century (413). Scholars now believe that it was composed in the 14th century (Yamashita 1998, 31), but this does not change Sternbach's overall argument.

Critical edition & translation

The question of how to edit a puranic story, or whether it is practical or even possible to do so, has been debated since at least the mid-twentieth century, especially following the publication of the critical edition of the Mahābhārata.<sup>39</sup> When some scholars began to produce critical editions of purānas, using the same principles that V. S. Sukthankar developed for the Mahābhārata, other scholars objected; in particular, Madeleine Biardeau rejected the attempt to reconstruct an archetype from multiple recensions, declaring that 'such a text never existed.... for this reason the main concern of the editors should be to publish not only the different recensions as they are, but also, when necessary, the different versions of each recension'.<sup>40</sup> In the case of the present edition, there is currently not enough material evidence to speak of different recensions of the Vahnipurāņa śiber  $up\bar{a}khy\bar{a}na$ , let alone an archetype with any sort of historical relevance. The oldest manuscript the Nepalese one — dates, speculatively, to the 12th century; the oldest quotations of the text, similarly, are also found in 12th-century dharmanibandhas, such as the Krtyakalpataru. But these witnesses do not cover even half of the text. Thus, it has not been possible to create a stemma for the entire text, with every witness represented; for example, it would be impossible to infer a relationship between the Satapañcāsatka and the Lingapurāna, since they never overlap. Moreover, since many verses are attested in only a couple of witnesses with very little variation, it has not been necessary to take recourse to a stemma. However, there are a number of verses for which there are a large number of attestations, and, in those cases, an individual stemma has been created for each of those verses.

Methodology

In the spirit of Biardeau's assertion that every version of the text is important, the starting point for this edition has been the diplomatic transcription of each and every available source — the Nepalese manuscript, Bhowmik's edition with all its variant readings, as well as all excerpts quoted in later texts, also with variant readings if they are given. These transcriptions — alongside digital images, where possible — are included in the supplementary material. For published texts, information about the edition which has been transcribed — the location of the physical copy, as well as the provenance of the digital facsimile — has been provided where available.

The transcriptions of each verse were normalized and aligned with the help of computer software,<sup>41</sup> and then a critical text was produced from that alignment. For the majority of the verses, this involved correcting scribal errors that obscured the meaning of the text. But for each verse that had a large degree of variation, the alignment was used to create a phylogenetic tree, using the neighbour joining algorithm.<sup>42</sup> The tree was rooted by taking a branch that encompassed all witnesses of the Vahnipurāņa — including quotations attributed to it — as an ingroup, and this rooted tree was used as a stemma. The text at the root was then reconstructed using the Fitch algorithm.<sup>43</sup> If there was a split, i.e., two viable readings for a given lemma, one from the Vahnipurāņa branch and one from the other branch (the outgroup), the reading from the Vahnipurāṇa branch was favoured, since, when a verse is used outside of the Vahnipurāṇa śiber upākhyāna, it often bears contextual differences: for example, vocatives are changed, since the addressee of a speech is different. In the instance of multiple viable readings even within the Vahnipurāṇa branch, the readings from VP<sup>BH</sup> and VP<sub>N</sub> were favoured. Using this as a starting point, grammar, syntax, and context were then taken into consideration, which may have resulted in a different variant being chosen. In a few cases — verses 44, 58, 64, and 68 — the text was emended.

Figure 4: Alignment of verse 34, showing an automatically reconstructed and normalized lemma, 'yaḥ ca', at the root. The alignment and tree depicted are available in the supplementary material, in the file alignments/VP65.34.xml. See Li 2022b for instructions on using the file.

The effective result of this method is thus: if the reading from the Vahnipurāņa ingroup<sup>44</sup> agreed with the reading from more distant sources, that reading was accepted. Otherwise, among the sources of the Vahnipurāņa itself, preference was given to Bhowmik's edition and the Nepalese manuscript over the quotations found in medieval dharmanibandhas. The text that emerges, then, is a text in transition: it brings into focus the Vahnipurāṇa śiber upākhyāna as it reuses older sources and is in turn quoted and reused by later writers, highlighting its influence on medieval and early modern Sanskrit literature and beyond.

The fully positive critical apparatus presents variant readings from Sanskrit printed editions, manuscripts, quotations, and parallels.<sup>45</sup> A Pali parallel is given for verse 7. For the Mahābhārata, variants have mainly been taken from the text of the critical edition and the southern recension; some verses which appear only in the apparatus of the critical edition have also been collated. Commentarial glosses, as well as Prakrit, Tibetan, and Chinese parallels have been noted in the translation, on the page facing the text edition. In the online supplementary material, a digital edition has been included, which was the basis for the critical text in this article. In addition, all transcriptions, alignments, and trees used in the process of its creation have also been provided. The aim has been to present the critical edition as a fully open and reproducible procedure: an interested reader may examine each step in the process and critique or modify any element of it.<sup>46</sup> It is hoped that this will also make it easier to reuse the work in future scholarship, whether on this text specifically or on a larger corpus.

&lt;sup>46</sup> The present work forms part of an effort toward creating digital editions that are, at once, critical, diplomatic, and documentary; see Li 2020 for a discussion on the topic.

Metre

The text is mostly composed in anuṣṭubh ślokas,<sup>47</sup> with the occasional verse expanded to three lines. The following vipulās are found:

- na-vipulā ( ): 38c, 72c
- bha-vipulā ( ˘ ): 35a, 70a, 79a
- ma-vipulā ( - - ): 6a, 23c, 26a, 66c, 77a

Verses 19-20 are in jagatī, and a variant reading in 19 renders it in vamśasthā metre.

Structural differences from the Bhowmik edition

The verse numbering in the present edition is identical to the numbering found in the Bhowmik edition, with the following exceptions:

- in verse 64, pādas b and d have been switched
- verse 58 now encompasses 3 lines, and verses 59–73 have shifted up one line
- an extra verse, 40<sup>bis</sup>, has been inserted between 40 and 41

The story of King Śibi

Maitreya said:
Listen King! I will speak of how Śibi truly gave an equal share of his own flesh! For once upon a time, there was a prince of the Uśīnaras:	1
Knowing that Śibi was devoted to truth and giving, Indra and Agni, wanting to test him, went to him while a great sacrifice was taking place.	2
A dove, who had been Agni — pursued by Indra as a hawk —, overcome with fear and seeking shelter, alighted on the king.	3
'Help me, Protector of the Earth!' it said, in fear of the hawk; and so the king comforted the shelter-seeking dove.	4
Then the hawk reached the king, and it said, in distress: 'Listen to me, King, I am a householder sick with hunger!	5
All the lords of the earth say you are a just person; would you commit this act, contradicting them, Ruler?	6

	C. Li
You conquer the ungrateful by generosity, the evil by good, cruelty by forgiveness, liars by truth.	7
The raging by detachment, the angry by calm, the lustful by dispassion, — so are the people conquered by you.	8
Everyone is concerned with their own benefit, while some aim to benefit others too. You aim always to benefit others, like a fruiting tree.	9
People don't even help others who help them; you, even when others intend to harm you, are always there to help.	10
That food has been furnished by the maker, just for me! Release the dove — protecting your own dharma — to the one who hungers'. <sup>54</sup>	11
He said to the hawk: 'This bird which has arrived at my side for protection — how could I abandon it, an act reviled by the wise?	12

&lt;sup>54</sup> The syntax of this verse is unclear. Grammatically, it seems to read, 'the dove, which is protecting its own dharma', but that does not seem to make sense in this context. The parallel in the Mahābhārata reads: 'That food which has been divinely appointed to me, Chief of Warriors, is this very dove; release it to me, Protector of the Earth!' Cf. also the hawk's response in the Uttarādhyayanaţīkā: bhukkhito ham, na maham dhammo mane thāi (ed. Vijayomangasūri 1936, 244v), 'Ich bin hungrig. Da denke ich nicht an den Dharma' (Oberlies 2009, 309).

Whether from greed, enmity, or fear, if one abandons a seeker of shelter, the learned say his crime is equal to killing a brāhmaṇa.	13
In the Śāstras, you see even great criminals being pardoned, but someone who abandons a shelter-seeker nowhere finds pardon.	14
Just as your own life is dear to you, so it is the same for all creatures. Thus the wise say, you should protect those creatures trembling from fear of death.	15
In the ocean of saṃsāra, mortals are forever tormented by the pain of birth, death, and old age, since they tremble before mortality. <sup>55</sup>	16
The cause of distress, fear, or anger, that root of misery should be renounced, even if it is a part of the body. <sup>56</sup>	17
From the suffering that arises when a man realizes, 'I will die', it can be inferred that others should be protected as well:	18

&lt;sup>56</sup> Many slight variations of this verse are found in different chapters and versions of the Mahābhārata, as well as in later quotations. Most editions have yatomūla in compound; however, Nīlakantha comments: yatah āyāsas tan mūlam kāranam āyāsādeh ekāngam śarīraikadeśabhūtam api tyajet kim uta dhanadārādi (ed. Kinjawadekar 1932, 296). In VPN, this verse has been added in the margin.

Stocked up with food, a creature lives for a long time, but deprived of food, it could not live long.	22

And with my death, all my family will be destroyed. You, while protecting the dove, fail to protect many other creatures.	24
Conqueror — a law which obstructs another law is no law; but, the virtuous say, a law which is non-contradictory is really law.	25
Therefore, having ascertained which is weightier in a contradiction among laws, on the basis of prosperity, <sup>58</sup> King, make a determination on the law!' <sup>59</sup>	26
The king said:
'On the one hand are all the sacrifices with all their precious offerings, on the other, protecting the life of a creature in fear.	27
Bird — there is no weightier law at all than safety given to creatures in fear.	28

It is better that a single being be granted life safety than a thousand adorned cattle granted to a thousand priests. <sup>60</sup>	29
On the earth, it is easy to find givers of gold, cattle, land, and such; hard to find in the world is a man who gives safety to all beings.	30
The merit of even great sacrifices diminishes with time; there is absolutely no diminishing of the gift of safety to the terrified.	31
For he who, filled with compassion, gives safety to all beings, when he is sundered from his body, there is no diminishing <sup>61</sup> at all.	32
Something offered, or sacrificed, a religious austerity performed, a pilgrimage, and even scripture — all together are not worth a sixteenth of the gift of safety.	33

&lt;sup>60</sup> Cf. Brhadāraņyakopanişad 3.1.1: sa ha gavām sahasram avarurodha | dašadaša pādā ekaikasyāh śrngayor ābaddhā babhūvuh, 'So he corralled a thousand cows; to the horns of each cow were tied ten pieces of gold' (ed. & trans. Olivelle 1998, 76–77). Thanks to an anonymous reviewer for pointing out this passage. The variant reading go-sahasram sadaksinam, 'a thousand cows accompanied by offerings', also bolsters this interpretation.

Between the one who gives the earth bounded by the four oceans, and the one who gives safety to all beings, <sup>62</sup> the safety-giver is greater. <sup>63</sup>	34
I would surrender even my kingdom, or even my body, so hard to give up, but I will not abandon this pitiful dove, trembling with fear.	35
By whatever good fortune I have accrued, in birth after birth, let there be a protector of beings in great pain, to destroy their suffering.	36
For I do not desire kingdom, nor heaven, nor liberation; I desire the destruction of suffering for suffering-stricken creatures.	37
As I have presented a valid explanation, please let this truth be to your satisfaction, Great Lord <sup>64</sup>	38
This mission of yours is just for the sake of food, Bird, so whatever food you wish, I will get it for you!'	39
The hawk declared: 'My food is none other than the dove. I want no other food apart from that, Your Majesty!	40
Therefore, Protector of the Earth, give me this deserved prize! From giving you will obtain knowledge, and from knowledge attain fulfillment.	40 bis

&lt;sup>63</sup> There are many variations on this verse; in particular, the Caturvargacintāmaņi has two versions, one attributed to the Mahābhārata (MBH<sub>Cc</sub>) which is closer to VP<sub>NAC</sub>, and the other attributed to the Vahnipurāņa (VP<sub>Cc</sub>) which is closer to VP<sup>BH</sup>. It is not found in MBH<sup>C</sup> or MBH<sup>S</sup>.

&lt;sup>64</sup> The vocative maheśvara and the polite bhagavān here suggests the king is speaking to a god, which contrasts with the vocative vihangama and the second-person tava in the next verse. The quotation from the Caturvargacintāmaņi ends here, at verse 38; verse 39 is only found, loosely paralleled, in the Āraŋyakaparvan.

A hawk kill doves; this has been established forever, King — if you can't find the path, don't go climbing a plantain tree!' <sup>65</sup>	41
The king said: 'Bird — nowhere have I taken the wrong path; this dharma, whose aim is compassion for all beings, is prescribed in the Dharmaśāstras.	42
Between a gift given to all beings and compassion for a single being, it is compassion which is greater than a gift to all beings.	43
All the Vedas and all the Śāstras, Bird, and bathing at every pilgrimage site, do not cause someone to have compassion for living beings.	44
But those who devote their speech, thought, & action to the well-being of all, those whose path is guided by compassion — they proceed to the Brahma world.	45
Moving, standing, sleeping, or awake, he who does not work toward the benefit of humans is known as a beast, and he is of no benefit even to himself.	46
Those creatures endowed with eyes, who see others — suffering or not — as themselves, proceed to the ultimate path.	47

Kinjawadekar 1930, 203). The simile of the trunk of the plantain tree (Pali kadalīkkhandha) being insubstantial is common in Buddhist literature (Bronkhorst 2007, 102; Cone 2001, 629; Lindtner 1981, 170). In fact, the plantain is not a tree, and its trunk is a pseudostem, formed of tightly packed leaves. Cf. also dharmaskandha (Pali dhammakkhandha).

But the powerful one, who neglects a creature being slain, goes to a terrible hell — so declare the wise.	48
I offer you my marvellous kingdom, Bird, or whatever else you desire, apart from the dove!'	49
The hawk said: 'Why is your favour so stuck on that bird? How about if you offer me an equal amount of your own flesh?'	50
The king replied: 'I am pleased that you ask for my flesh! I offer you my flesh right away, weighed to measure.	51
I will give what is asked of me, Sir, <sup>66</sup> this which is of worth to you; since for one who is devoted to the law of truth, it is utterly worthless.	52

	C. Li
Having said this, the king tore off his flesh, and weighed an amount equal to the dove, with delight.	55
The noble, having abandoned their desire for their own happiness and pleasure, who tend to- ward the happiness of all beings, constantly suffer from the suffering of others.	56
But the dove weighed more on the scale, so again, the ruler tore off more flesh and gave it up.	57
When no amount of flesh equalled the dove the noble one, even bereft of flesh, experienced the highest joy; when it did not weigh enough, he himself climbed onto the scale.	58
Not among the excellent women of the palace, nor in the kingdom, not among the living, no one could compare to him, whose mind was devoted to compassion.	59
Perpetually pained by the suffering of others, the great-souled do not expect their own pleasures to abound; they are devoted to the welfare of all beings.	60
Striving for the sake of others, there is nothing the virtuous could not achieve, just as the water of the ocean is drunk by the clouds. <sup>67</sup>	61
There is only one path for the virtuous: keeping one's promises, as the lord of the waters made a burning fire in his chest. <sup>68</sup>	62

&lt;sup>67</sup> Verses 61–63 seem to be about water and fire, the ocean and the sun. Although jalada, 'rain-giver', is typically a cloud, in the Rgveda, Agni is also associated with rain because he is identified with lightning (Jamison & Brereton 2014, 204). The underwater fire (see the next verse) is also said to drink the ocean and let it out again. These verses may also pertain to the worship of Agni, since this story is part of the Vahnipurāņa.

&lt;sup>68</sup> This seems to be a reference to vaḍavāgni, the 'submarine doomsday fire' that is held at the bottom of the ocean (Doniger O'Flaherty 1971, 13). It may also be a reference to Varuṇa creating fire on the waters in Ŗgveda V.85, or to Agni as Apām napāt, the child of the waters who 'shines without kindling wood within the waters' (X.30, trans. Jamison & Brereton 2014, 1423). Śibi is also currently sheltering Agni (as a dove) in the story, although there does not seem to be a version of the story in which he holds the dove to his chest (Meisig 1995, 115–116). Jayadāl Śarmā, seemingly quoting from the Śabdakalpadruma entry for 'sādhuḥ', comments: sādhu janoṃ kā eka yahī mārga hai ki ve angīkṛta (svīkṛta) kā pālana karate haiṃ, dekho! samudra ne prajvalita agni ko goda meṃ dhāraṇa kara rakkhā hai (1920, 231).

The noble one who even neglects himself experiences the highest joy, as a tree delights those sheltering under it, while it endures its own suffering. <sup>69</sup>	63
When the king of the Uśīnaras had mounted the scale, heavenly drums sounded, and there was a rain of flowers. <sup>70</sup>	64
From this, Śakra had understood enough, and, taking his own form, he said this to the paragon of a lawful king:	65
'I am Indra, Sir, <sup>71</sup> and the dove is fire. Wanting to test you, King, we came to this sacrifice.	66
Here, you performed something difficult, with great compassion. Never before have kings done this, nor will others do it again.	67
Your joy from abandoning your vital breaths in the service of another exceeds <sup>72</sup> the joy of creatures whose lives were lost and gained again. <sup>73</sup>	68
Kind exclusively to others, cruel to the interests of the one in which she resides, <sup>74</sup> only toward yourself, King, was compassion uncompassionate! <sup>75</sup>	69

C II

This whole world is bound firm by the snares of its own karma; you, for the sake of liberating the world from suffering, are bound by compassion, King!	70
Helpless, frightened, distressed, poor, begging, diseased, whether seen before or not, they receive your kindness equally.	71
Just as the sun abides, surpassing all the stars, so your kindness abides, surpassing the laws.	72
Not envying the distinguished, nor spurning the low, not competing with equals, you became the best of the world.	73
The one who protects the lives of others with his own life goes to the highest place, from which there is no return.	74
Even with your life, King, you protected helpless people, you gave even your own flesh, not to speak of other things. <sup>76</sup>	75
For even animals live to fill only their own belly, but he who lives for the sake of others — his life alone is praiseworthy.	76
And how wonderful, that the virtuous are devoted to helping others! For sandalwood trees are not born to cool their own body. <sup>77</sup>	77

&lt;sup>77</sup> This simile is unclear, but cf. verse 63 above. This verse may also be referring to the cooling properties of sandal-wood paste; in the Arthaśāstra, sandalwood is said to be 'able to bear heat' and 'absorbing heat': uṣṇasaham dāha-grahi... iti candanagunāh (2.11.56, ed. The man who is devoted to the work of helping others obtains the highest position, even higher than the highest.	78
Minds bent on helping others, without desire for their own happiness, such noble men are born on the earth for the welfare of the world.	79
That you cut flesh from your own limbs, King — this will be your eternal glory, encompassing the worlds.	80
And, bearing your divine form, <sup>78</sup> you will protect the earth for a long time, and then, surpassing all the worlds, ascend to the Brahma world'.	81
Having said this to him, Indra and Agni left for the abode of the thirty-three gods <sup>79</sup> while the king, after performing his sacrifice, rejoiced like a god.	82
He who listens repeatedly to this story of the supreme conduct of Śibi, released from all evils, will go to heaven.	83

Thus ends the story of Śibi in the Vahnipurāņa.

&lt;sup>79</sup> Cf. the ending of two Chinese versions: 還于天宮 (T201, 343c.2–3), 'returned to the heavenly palace'; 還天上 (T1509, 88c26), 'returned to heaven'.

Supplementary material

The online version of the critical edition can be found at tst-project.github.io/siberupakhyana. It contains the critical text as well as all diplomatically transcribed witnesses. The transcriptions are linked to digital images from institutional repositories, where available. These files, as well as the text alignments, can be found in the code repository: github.com/TST-Project/siberupakhyana. The alignment files also include phylogenetic trees, if they were used in the reconstruction of a particular verse. The repository is archived by Zenodo (doi:10.5281/zenodo.7446515). For the software used to create the alignments, see Li 2022a.
